Notes:

My third effort to add my voice to those trying to bring the mass murder in Palestine to an end. The starting point was outside the Foreign Office in Whitehall on this occasion so I took the train to St. Pancras and then was able to use my bus pass on the 91 to Charing Cross.

The march was less well attended than on the previous occasions but still substantial. I am concerned that without being linked to a special day, with much stronger attempts to reach the wider public for a one off effort, attendance will continue to decline.

Once again thrilled at the London sights and the proximity of it all. It is only in documenting the images that I discover where exactly we were; street names; details of artists, engineers and architects; and the names and purposes of major buildings.

I also noticed when documenting the pictures the number of Jewish Groups on the March. I had seen the Hasidic Jews, who I know to be anti-zionist, en route on the previous marches and the large contingents of Orthodox Jews assembling in the side streets at start of those demonstrations but had not previously spotted the banners of specific organisation: Jewish Voice for Labour, Jewish Socialist Group, Jewish Network for Palestine and the International Jewish Anti-Zionist Network.

I was a hit once again in the café and when leaving the lady of the house joined me on the door step, asked for, and was given, permission to twirl my moustache.

I walked back to Charing Cross and was pleased while on my way, to be able to give directions from Millbank to a chap looking for Victoria. I am beginning to think I would like to return to London, perhaps for my last innings and to do it properly this time.

At Charing Cross, possibly on the Strand, while waiting for the 91 I was thrilled to be joined by a beautiful Routemaster. The number 15, which I understand has been reinstated as a tourist attraction, stood with its diesel engine throbbing, waiting for its timetabled departure time. I had taken a couple of snaps with my phone when a couple offered to take pictures with me in the frame. I was as they say made up.

I am disappointed that of those who said of my first trip, that they would have liked to have been there, not one has been on any of the subsequent demonstrations.
